DIRECTOR'S NOTE

The Crucible is one of those plays that everyone has heard about and has always wanted to see but just hasn't had the time or opportunity to get around to it. Written by one of the finest playwrights in the American theatre, The Crucible explores important questions about maintaining your personal integrity when confronted with a system which seems bent on forcing you to make immoral choices.

Set in the 1690's during the Salem witch trials, the play follows the path of John Proctor and the citizens of Salem who must face naming their friends and neighbors as witches in order to save themselves from the gallows. When Arthur Miller was writing this play, the country was in the middle of another witch hunt; the 1950's communist witchhunt of Senator Joe McCarthy and the House Committee on UnAmerican Activities. Miller had seen many of his friends and colleagues called before HUAC and asked to name their friends as communist sympathizers. He had seen many of the best writers and artists of his generation sent to prison and blacklisted rather than name names, and others forced to choose between prison and betraying their friends.

In The Crucible, Miller shows how quickly good intentions and a few dishonest people can lead to chaos and destruction. He does this through characters who are human, with human weaknesses and human greatness. While he was writing about the 1950's, this play also speaks to questions in the year 2004. It reminds us how easy it is for a concerned and worried population to surrender freedom in the face of an evil threat. It asks us to question our own actions and to realize how difficult it is to maintain your integrity, especially when those in power seem to be giving you an easy way out. In the end, Elizabeth Proctor is asked to go to her husband and appeal to him to lie about his guilt for the good of the village. She says that he has found his honesty and she won't take that from him. What is your honesty worth?

On behalf of the cast and crew, we hope you enjoy the show,
